Abstract (en)

A hand held machine for placing fastener means of different length, such as screws, nails or tracks, which are mutually parallel supported by a belt movable through an exchangeable magazine (4). The machine body consists of at least two body parts (1,2) that are telescopically extendible and retractable in order to receive an exchangeable cassette-type magazine (4). The placing tool, such as a screw driver, nailing or tacking hammer is with regard to its operating head adjustable to the different length of the fastener means. The magazines may have a width different for each length of the fastener means or a constant width. The belts carry the fastener means and are movable through the magazines.
