Abstract (en)
The present invention relates to a board game of skill and provides three boards adapted to be disposed vertically one above the other or laid in a line through their axis. Each board has a plurality of zones extending outwardly from a central region in a plurality of directions. Preferably the zones are defined by concentric circles and radially spaced outwardly extending lines. Two sets of playing pieces are provided and are movable from one zone to another zone. Forty eight pieces are assigned to each board and are only permitted to move on the board to which they are assigned. The remaining six senior pieces are permitted to move from one board to another. The layout of the board allows the pieces to move circumferentially, radially or spirally, as prescribed by the rules.
