Abstract (en)
[origin: EP0400662A1] The Venetian blind has a plurality of slats (5) which can be drawn up by means of draw-up strings or the like, and is particularly intended for a light entry aperture leading into a room, preferably a window. At least some of the slat surfaces are provided with a highly reflective, in particular high-gloss, mirror coating. In order to make it possible to shut the sunlight out of the room or bring it into the room, each of the slats is divided into at least two slat portions (5a, 5b) extending in the longitudinal direction of the slat, the slat portions (5a, 5b) of each of these slats (5) being pivotably connected to each other. <IMAGE>
