Abstract (en)
[origin: EP0761147A1] The curtain is clamped to rings suspended from the rope. At each side of the window (1) and clear of the edge of the latter is an attachment bolt (2) fixed to the wall. The distance-pieces (3) contain drillings or notches accommodating the rope, and are supported on the wall between the bolts and window edges. A clamp (5) between the rope ends forms it into an endless one, and part at least of it is passed through the notches or drillings in the distance-pieces. There can be two runs of rope between the latter, which can be triangular, with their hypotenuses against the wall, the drillings or notches being contained in the apex, or in the side towards the ceiling.
