Abstract (en)

[origin: WO0117777A1] A test-printing method for a rotary press with a determinable ink coverage, whereby a test-printing form having a first and a second printing area is used, which method comprises determining the ink coverage provided by the rotary press, designing the test-printing form layout to the effect that the ink requirement does not, for any part of the combined first and second printing areas, essentially exceed a predetermined value V, said value V being set in a predetermined relation to the determined ink coverage; and the ink requirement of said second printing area amounts to a value essentially representing the difference between said value V and the ink requirement of said first printing area. A rotary press test-printing form having a layout designed for use in the test-printing method.
