Abstract (en)

[origin: WO03103262A1] A system for sending real-time information in a communication network includes a calling party's communication device and a called party's communication device. The calling party attempts to make a call to the called party and receives an indication that the called party is unavailable. The called party also provides an address to which the calling party may send non-real time information. The calling party may then record non-real time information and send it to the address provided by the called party in non-real time. When sending to the called party, the calling party may merely provide an address from which the called party may retrieve the non-real time information.
