Abstract (en)

A surgical device is disclosed, the surgical device including a housing, a tube disposed on the housing, and an elongate member. The housing is adapted for insertion into an incision in tissue and defines a proximal end and a distal end. The tube extends distally from the proximal end of the housing to the distal end of the housing and further circumnavigates the distal end of the housing. The elongate member is insertable into the tube to provide additional rigidity to the tube. The housing has a first state prior to insertion of the elongate member and a second state after insertion of the elongate member. The distal end of the housing is collapsible when in the first state to facilitate insertion into the incision and has additional rigidity when in the second state for securing the housing within the incision.
