Abstract (en)
The invention describes a tool and accessory holder device, configured to be worn by a user and consisting of a foldable sheet-type structure comprising a front flap and a rear flap connected together, in a flexible manner, at a mutual joining portion. The front flap and the rear flap can overlap one another in a closed configuration, or use configuration, of the device. On a first surface of the front flap one or more compartments or pockets configured for containing one or more tools or accessories are provided. On a second surface of the front flap opposite such a first surface at least one first holding means is provided, configured to join with at least one second holding means provided on a predetermined surface of the rear flap. At least one of the first holding means and the second holding means consists of one or more magnets, whereas the remaining holding means consists of at least one element made of ferromagnetic material. In the closed configuration of the device, the joining of the first holding means with the corresponding second holding means, obtained by magnetic attraction, allows the front flap to overlap the rear flap. The front flap and the rear flap, together with the mutual joining portion, thus define a cavity inside the device that allows such a device to be applied around a predetermined portion of a garment of the user.
