(54) Removable construction structure, particularly for dry construction of buildings and portions of buildings

(57) A removable construction structure, particularly for the dry construction of buildings and portions of buildings, including a plurality of construction components which are adapted to build stackable and interlockable courses, in which each one of the construction components includes a central body, which is constituted by a fixed portion, and a lateral body, which is joined to the fixed portion so as to be monolithic therewith. The central body can be detachably engaged with the central bodies of adjacent construction components related to the same course. A detachable engagement means detachably engages the lateral body of construction components that belong to a first course with the central body of construction components that belong to a second course, which is contiguous but not coplanar with respect to the first course. The structure can be optionally completed by enclosing the wall between outer layers, which allow to utilize extremely useful and versatile technical areas for the passage of utilities and/or for ventilation.
